San Diego’s Patrick Henry High School will mark the 55th anniversary of its birth this fall with the release of Give Me Liberty: The Early Years of Patrick Henry High. The one-hour film will have its world premiere on Sunday, October 15 at 7 PM on the school’s campus in the Patrick Henry Arts, Media and Entertainment Center (PHAME). It is produced and directed by seven-time Emmy Award-winner David Plaut, a member of Patrick Henry’s Class of 1971.

Give Me Liberty chronicles the first years of Patrick Henry’s existence (1968-73), when it was one of only seven institutions in the nation to participate in the Model Schools Program. Patrick Henry’s innovative modular scheduling became a laboratory of experimental education, providing students with unprecedented freedom to make choices that shaped their academic goals. An open campus, flexible elective studies, enhanced tutoring and cutting-edge teaching approaches in traditional core courses were all part of an initiative that encouraged students to take more responsibility and think independently.

Because Give Me Liberty is a non-profit project, all money collected for the face value of event tickets is tax-deductible, ““Because “Give Me Liberty” is a production of the Patrick Henry High School Alumni Association, Inc., a 501c(3) non-profit organization, a significant portion of the ticket price is meant to recover production expenses and maybe tax-deductible (consult your tax advisor).

Even with current students and alumni voluntarily actively participating in the project, producing a full-length documentary film is still expensive. Costs for footage and image licensing, recording studio time, color correction, photo restoration and sound design are essential, and well worth the investment to properly tell the story of Patrick Henry's origins.

We need your help with a last push for donations to complete the project. No amount is too small and donation information is at the end of this email.

The story of Give Me Liberty is told through interviews with 52 former students and faculty who were “present at the creation.” Their eyewitness accounts are paired with archival photos, campus memorabilia, news accounts and never-before-seen film footage. Together they weave a vivid narrative that connects school origin stories to the turbulent socio-political issues of the late 1960s and early 70s.

Highlights of the film include:

- A portrait of the school’s first principal -- the man behind Patrick Henry’s cutting-edge educational system
- Stories of young, hand-picked teachers who formed the most innovative faculty in the city school system
- How national-brand pet food products were crucial to Patrick Henry’s development
- The surprising individual who wrote Patrick Henry’s alma mater lyrics and picked the school colors
- The unexpected mishap during the school’s first theatrical production
- The bizarre gadget play that earned Patrick Henry its first varsity football victory – and rare footage of the Patriots’ first CIF basketball championship
- Profiles of students from the era who went on to distinguished careers in law, medicine, sports, technology, performance arts and philanthropy

Give Me Liberty is an immersive production, utilizing the talents of Patrick Henry students as location crew, camera/sound operators and editors. The film’s original soundtrack was composed and performed by Patrick Henry music students. Patrick Henry alumni were instrumental in gathering archival materials, conducting interviews and providing many services essential to the filmmaking experience.
